Mrs. Phyllis Williamson left Tuesday for Orono for a visit with her sister and mother, Mrs. Daley Crosby and Ruth Crosby.

Winter really has arrived with a ten inch snow fall and two-inch storms during the past week.

Well old Mother Nature did not wish us to study the sleeping habits of the woodchuck so she woke it up until it pulled the wires around the cage door and out it went. Then dug its way out of the cellar and ran off. The last trace was its foot prints on some soft dirt by the ducks' bath tub as if it took a drink and left town, much to many's disappointment.

Mrs. Mary Morin and Mrs. Julia Fleet beat the snow storm by a short time as they did Christmas shopping Tuesday at Rumford.

RED CROSS WARNS OF COLD HANDS, NOSES AND FROSTBITE

Snow, ice, and bitterly cold winds may soon bring us another of winter's painful and sometimes dangerous 'tricks'—frostbite.

Howard E. Camp, Jr., area director of Safety Services for the Red Cross Eastern Area, says frostbite can occur, unnoticed, to hands, feet, ears, or nose of anyone outdoors in the bitter weather.

"It occurs to the extremities of the body, where there is limited blood circulation," explained Camp. "Frostbite is recognizable and painful, but unless it's a severe case it can be treated effectively at home."

He said mild frostbite causes the skin to become reddened (later changing to white or grayish-yellow), numb, and cold. The best treatment is to cover the area with a loosely wrapped wool scarf or sweater and get indoors.

"Don't stay outside, or rub the area or press snow against it," warned Camp. He said rubbing can injure the skin and tear the underlying tissue. Once indoors, Camp said, the frozen area will thaw and begin to ache.

"You can warm it by placing your hand over the frostbitten spot," said Camp. Mildly frostbitten hands or feet may be immersed in water of 90-100 degrees, but no hotter.

If, after thawing, the pain worsens and persists, then medical attention should be sought.

Severe frostbite, the Red Cross official noted, demands the immediate care of a doctor. Severe frostbite turns the skin red and then white or grayish-yellow. Blisters may appear. The frostbitten area will be numb, very cold, and become rigid.

"Get this person to a doctor, right away," says Camp. "Don't use water, just wrap a scarf loosely around the area."

He said frostbite can be prevented by wearing warm clothing when going outdoors. Wool mittens are suggested instead of gloves, and wool socks. Ears should be covered by earmuffs (even under a hood), particularly the ears of young children. The popular knitted ski caps cover the entire head and have small openings for the eyes and mouth.

"Don't stay outdoors too long, particularly if you are damp or if there's a wind. On a cold day, wind speeds the freezing and you can be frostbitten before you realize it," said Camp.

Mr. and Mrs. Everett Saunders and family, Bethel, on his twelfth birthday Harry received gifts and refreshments were served, including a birthday cake made and decorated by Mrs. Patricia Saunders. Attending besides the honored guest were Mrs. Eleanor Morton, Albert Jr., Peter and Jack, Newry, Mr. and Mrs. Everett Saunders, Roberta, Robert and Richard, Bethel.

THIS IS AMERICA! —AN ENGLISH VIEW

Charles Lamb recommended that anyone who wanted to know what true silence is should go to a Quaker meeting.

It is still good advice, though there is something a bit artificial and deliberate about the planned suspension of sound for a predetermined period.

Seekers for silence might try parts of the United States instead.

To begin with, there is the negative quietness — the absence of the sort of rows which most newcomers still expect to meet.

The diffused essence of writing from and about America produces an impression of continuous commotion and stridency. Babbitt cranks his car and hustles his way about Zenith; Charles Dickens' complaints of the "creeching, hissing, yelling, panting locomotives" and the human madstrom; the elevated railway rattles about the milling New York of Damon Runyon; Atlanta burns and Batman goes stark.

Small Maine Town

Of course, all literary impressions of places are false and the pleasure of travel is that it enables the traveler to scrap them. Many people have noted that New York is a less rackety place than London or Rome (let alone Cairo or Calcutta), and that New England decorum did not die when Boston engulfed James's suburbs. But, for one new arrival, at any rate, the moment of truth came in a small town in Maine.

The new arrival struck north from the coast driving along roads more or less parallel to the New Hampshire border. This went through or by places with a splendid variety of names — Indian, like Oxsipee and Sebago; imagination, like Mexico, Peru, Norway; direct importations from the old world, such as Biddeford, two 'da's to the English ones and Limerick.

Original Settlers

Then came one of the Old Testament place-names with which this part of the world is so rich, one of the many Bethels to be found where the party of the original settlers, it must be assumed, felt a ladder between their homes on earth and God in heaven could be built.

Bethel, Maine, is a large village or small town, on the edge of the White Mountain National Forest, where the hills are beginning to be fairly steep rather than low and undulating. They are thickly covered with trees, and the broad roads, cut neat tracks through the forest as if a giant lawnmower had been at work.

The approach to Bethel from the south is past a large country club style hotel beyond which is a fat square of grass — a large-scale village green — with frame houses and small commercial buildings all around it. Dipping down the other side is the principal business street — banks, drug store, filling station, attorneys' offices, and so forth, for about a quarter of a mile.

Absolute Silence

The time was 3 o'clock in the afternoon on a weekday. The weather overcast, cool, and windless. It was an occasion of absolute silence. Nobody was in sight. Not even a leaf fell to the ground, and not one of the ubiquitous squirrels stirred itself.

In the distance a couple of cars slid off the road in front of one of the stores. But they too made no noise like big fish gliding under a boat, their slide and motion emphasized their lack of sound.

It was one of those rare moments when silence does, in fact, become almost audible.

Going on farther through the town, house after house remained still and to all appearance uninhabited. Each wooden structure was deserted but decorated like a doll's house at a seaside resort in winter. The forest came up to the fences at the back, intended as it always had been, and ready to take over again if ever human vigilance was relaxed.

It was as though winter snow had already settled over the town, utterly halting its activity. Once no more disaster had struck it leaving it an urban Mary Celeste. From now, perhaps, it was like finding oneself transported into one of those grave motion less village scenes of primitive American painting.

For a quarter of an hour, this impersonal silence persisted. Then a girl left a house and began walking briskly down the street; a red car came around a corner; two schoolboys emerged in a house yard and began kicking a football about. The spell was broken.

But is it unreal to think that there is a degree of stillness to be found where Americans live that is hard now to find in Europe?

The unlimited space available for building both roads and houses may have something to do with it, as well as the blanket surrounding of the ubiquitous untouched tree forest. And, of course, the automobile, movement is usually by car, and Americans' cars make little or no noise.

To redress the balance of silent Maine a contrast is needed. What contrast could be more striking than the annual football match between the Universities of Texas and Oklahoma, and the 24 hours' celebration which precedes it? If Maine is a temple of peace, Dallas (where the match is held) is on this occasion dedicated to the cult of noise.

The two universities are old rivals. Their game is on a Texas scale. Travelers converge on Dallas which, though in Texas, is about half-way between the contestants (Texas University is in Austin), as the great day — a Saturday — draws near.

As dark falls on Friday evening, the streets in the center of the city begin to fill up and the spirit of misrule takes over.

The visitor who tries to force his way through the crowd in Commerce street finds it hard to believe that these young men and women are all, at normal times, devoted to academic pursuits. And obviously not all of them are, any more than are the crowds in university towns who, on Guy Fawkes day, try the patience of the English police.

There are two streams of Dallas celebrants — the mechanized and the infantry:

—The mechanized are in cars, each of which holds as many, in and around it, as it can, looking like an Italian tram in the rush hour.

—The infantry just crush along the sidewalk like Christmas shopping crowds in Oxford street.

Each member of each stream appears to know everybody in the other and yells a greeting. Every car-driver hoots all the time. The noise is deafening.

Moreover, everybody is apparently drunk. They all carry a bottle by the neck, which is waved and quaffed with abandon, and then flung into the gutter and smashed.

But is the drunkenness real? Apart from the fact that some of the bottles, on closer inspection, seem to be Coke, there is an extraordinary discipline in both streams.

The traffic lights flick on and off, regardless of the throng below them. When they are green, the carborne rioters edge forward. When the lights are red, they stop.

This gives the whole scene rather the atmosphere of a gigantic stage orgy.

Of course, the discipline may be in part due to respect for the Dallas police. Whatever else may be said about this body (and quite a lot has in the last three years been said about them) nobody has accused them of softness. That is something for citizens of big D, drunk or sober, to remember.

But more, this must be part of an inborn consciousness of the ritual of traffic with which Americans, in a civilization conditioned by the internal combustion engine, are endowed.

The next day, there is a parade through these same central streets — beautiful floats (Miss Dallas, potato chips, Texan Czechs, etc.), hundreds of horsemen, horsewomen, and horsechildren in Stetson hats, and band after band. Most of the broken

With the coming of Thanksgiving it is time again to "Talk Turkey," to turn in thought to the first Thanksgiving and the Pilgrims to the glorious heritage of America. Some one once wrote "All riches are desirable and we are justified in seeking them all; but the riches of mind and soul give the greatest happiness and add the most to the value of life." So count your blessings during this holiday week and you will find much to be thankful for.

And then, in the afternoon, the game itself. That is another story. One ingredient of that is noise — bands again, and endless cheering.

Thus, in east or west, inaudible or very audible indeed, America is to be observed, wondered at, and loved.
